

DOGS AND ACCESS: GUIDANCE FOR ACCESS & SITE MANAGERS

There are around 6 million dogs in the United Kingdom, and about a third of all people out for a walk have a dog with them. With such a high number of dogs in this country, their owners are a major segment of countryside and woodland visitor market.

With good management and access provision, dog walkers can be very supportive, responsible visitors, with a keen long-term interest in conserving the areas they value. Conversely, low levels of access provision and predominantly negative, restrictive management, can lead to conflict and alienation of this visitor group.

This sheet aims to give you some initial pointers to optimise the benefits of dog walking and minimise any negative effects that can occur.

Why people walk dogs

Because dog walking is such a traditional activity in the British countryside, the benefits to society can often be overlooked. Acknowledging both the positive and negative aspects of dog walking is the key to successful access management.

Walking a dog helps people:

- Have healthier lifestyles and reduce stress through taking regular walks, even on the duller days.
- Feel more confident when out for a walk, or feel less conspicuous when out alone.
- Prevent social isolation by acting as an icebreaker for contact with others.
- Overcome disabilities through the 5,000 assistance dogs that help with visual impairments, deafness, epilepsy and diabetes. Many of these people will not have a mobility impairment, and so need to be considered in all countryside areas through the adoption of a 'least restrictive approach' to management and infrastructure.

People have dogs for many reasons. For example, dogs can be the traditional, faithful friend, allow participation in activities like shooting or canine sports, or - especially for older people - they can be the living reminder of a deceased partner.

Whatever the relationship, there is often a very close bond between owners and their dogs which - if handled sensitively - can be a very powerful way to influence behaviour. Conversely, giving out predominantly negative messages or comments can lead to very emotive and unhelpful conflict.

Established in 1873, the Kennel Club is the non-governmental organisation responsible for the regulation of dog breeding, health and competition. Its aim is to be the first port of call on all canine matters, including training clubs, rescue societies, publications, access advice, gifts and fact sheets.

Benefits for countryside managers from engaging with dog owners:

- Dog owners can be regular, supportive visitors with a keen interest in conserving areas they care about.
- As regular visitors, dog walkers can provide informal surveillance and let you know of unlawful, unusual or suspicious activities.
- Compliance with any restrictions or requests is much easier with a community that feels welcome, valued and thus develops internal influence through peer pressure.
- Income can be raised from associated facilities, events and services.

Ways to engage with dog owners:

- Speak to them face to face and find out their issues; approaching them with your own friendly dog can help break down initial barriers.
- Recognise that dog walkers too want a relaxing time without conflict.
- Accept that many dog owners will want somewhere their dog can be safely off the lead; consider management that lets this happen away from sensitive areas.
- If conflict does occur, ask people what is happening and why. Look for positive solutions that make all interests feel welcome and accommodated somewhere.
- The principles in the Forestry Commission's Managing Dogs in the Woods guidance (March 2007) illustrate opportunities and solutions towards a more effective and mutually-beneficial approach to managing access for walkers with dogs.

Signs and other management can be most effective when they:

- Make dog owners feel like welcome visitors who are being asked to be responsible.
- Explain the reasons for any restrictions (such as dogs on a lead), and where their extent and duration are proportionate to the issue being addressed. Ensure seasonal signs - eg for nesting birds/lambs - are not left up longer than required.
- Offer alternatives to any restrictions, such as "dog friendly" routes away from sensitive areas. These also help others avoid areas where dogs go, if they so wish.
- Clearly indicate where restrictions start and finish.
- Connect with dog owners' values. For example, requests to not let dogs chase wildlife because the dog may get lost or injured, will be more effective than just talking about nature conservation.
- Have a contact name and telephone number for any queries.
- Are initially tested on the target audience to check understanding and reaction.
- Have been designed and located to reflect local circumstances; generic signs may be convenient but often have limited effectiveness.

You can obtain free copies of "You and your dog in the countryside" (CA205) to give out to dog owners from Natural England publications: tel 0870 120 6466